Turkish-Armenian, and Eastern Armenian, which is spoken in the Caucasus Mountains. Armenian is a member of the Indo-European language family. But while it shares some linguistic traits with the Greek and Indo-Iranian language branches, most linguists categorize Armenian on its own independent branch of the greater Indo-European language tree.

Some of the structural similarities Armenian shares with other Indo-Iranian languages include subject-object-verb word order, postpositions, and use of declensions. One major divergence is that Armenian is the only agglutinative Indo-European language (words formed by joining discrete affixes together to create a meaning). Agglutination is much more commonly an Altaic language trait (Korean, Japanese, Turkish, etc).

WHAT IS ARMENIAN CULTURE LIKE?

Armenian culture is very similar to the cultures of their neighbors in the Caucasus, the geopolitical region on the border of Europe and Asia between the Black and Caspian Sea and home of the Caucasus Mountains that includes Armenia, Azerbaijan, Turkey, Iran, and parts of Russia.

The Armenians are especially well known for their dance heritage, which is among the oldest and richest in the near east. In fact, anthropologists have discovered rock murals in the region depicting Armenian dancing that date back to the third millennia BC. Furthermore, Armenians also have a rich literary history dating back to 401 AD, including epic poems and ballads which go hand in hand with their traditional dances.

Armenians are also famous for carpet weaving and lacemaking. Armenian style carpets, called Artsakh, date back to the thirteenth century and typically feature rich colors and an animal motif (popular themes include eagles, dragons, and serpents).

Armenian needlelace is a highly sought after style of lace that is made using only a needle, thread, and a pair of scissors, using a pattern of intricately tied knots to create a design.
