BOOK:

*Claiming Society for God: Religious Movements and Social Welfare in Egypt, Israel, Italy, and the United States.* 2012, Indiana University Press (with Nancy J. Davis).

Across the world today, religiously orthodox (what some would call “fundamentalist”) movements of Christians, Jews, and Muslims have converged on a common strategy to install their own brand of faith at the center of societies they regard as alarmingly secularized. While many scholars, political observers, and world leaders, especially since 9/11, see this shared line of attack as involving armed struggle or terrorism, Claiming Society for God shows that the strategy-in-common of the most prominent and successful religiously orthodox movements is not violence, but a patient, under-the-radar takeover of civil society that the authors call “bypassing the state.” Telling the stories of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, the Sephardi Torah Guardians or Shas in Israel, Comunione e Liberazione in Italy, and the Salvation Army in the U.S, Davis and Robinson show how, one institution at a time, these movements are building massive, grassroots networks of religion-based social service agencies, hospitals and clinics, clubs, rotating credit societies, schools, charitable organizations, worship centers, and businesses—networks that are already being called states within states, surrogate states, or parallel societies. Bypassing the state, rather than directly confronting it, allows these movements to quietly accomplish their theological, cultural, and economic agendas across the nation, address local needs not being met by the state, and establish a broad base of popular support that some of them use to push their agendas in the arena of party politics. This bottom-up, entrepreneurial strategy is not mere reformism or accommodation to the state; it is aimed at nothing less than making religion the cornerstone of society.
